

par..., Publications de l'Institut Français d'Indologie No.63. Pondichéry.

Kaviraj, G. (1987) Notes on Religion and Philosophy, edited by Gaurinath Shastri, The Princess of Wales Sarasvati Bhavana Studies (Reprint Series No.3), Sampurnanand Sanskrit University. Varanasi.

Kielhorn, L.F. (1960²) The Paribhāṣenduśekhara of Nāgojibhaṭṭa, edited and explained by..., part II: Translation and Notes. Second Edition by K.V. Abhyankar, Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute. Poona (I Ed. 1874).

Reich, W.(1973²) Cosmic Superimposition: Man's Orgonotic Roots in Nature. New York.

Renou, L. (1940) La Durghaṭavṛtti de Śaraṇadeva, traité grammatical en sanscrit du XII siècle, édité et traduit par..., tome I, fasc. I, Introduction, Les Belles Lettres. Paris.

Repetto, M.P. (1986) "Il mito di Trisaṅku nello Skanda-purāṇa", in: Atti del Terzo Convegno Nazionale di Studi Sanscriti (Bologna, 24 Maggio 1984), editi da O. Botto a cura di S. Piano e V. Agostini. Torino (pp. 55-79).

Sferra, F. (1994) "Le speculazioni su Vāc in alcuni testi del Pāñcarātra", Rivista degli Studi Orientali, LXVIII, Fasc. 1-2 (pp.45-108).

Singh, J. (1988) Abhinavagupta's Parātrīśikā-vivaraṇa. The Secret of Tantric Mysticism, English translation with notes and running exposition by..., Sanskrit text corrected [...] by Swami Lakshmanjee, edited by B. Bäumer. Delhi.

Torella, R. (1987) "Examples of the Influence of Sanskrit Grammar on Indian Philosophy". East and West, 37 (pp.151-164).

Varma, Siddheshvar (1961²) Critical Studies in the Phonetic Observations of Indian Grammarians. Delhi (I Ed. 1929).

Vivanti, M.P. (1985) Il Kiraṇāgama. Testo e traduzione del Vi-dyāpāda, Suppl. n.3 agli Annali dell'Istituto Orientale di Napoli, vol.35, fasc.2.

Studies in Hinduism II
Miscellaneous to the Phenomenon of Tantra, Gerhard Oberhammer (ed.)
1972

THE SEXUAL ASPECT OF THE LINGA CULT ACCORDING TO THE SAIDDHĀNTIKA SCRIPTURES*

by Hélène Brunner

53

1. Introduction

It may be for some a matter of surprise to read the title of my paper, where sex is associated with the one Śaiva school which is reputed for its discretion regarding this matter. Actually, I am not going to turn upside down our knowledge of Siddhānta and reveal such things as the existence of sexual practices by the adherents of this school as a form of their regular sādhana: such practices are not totally unknown, but they are described by a minority of texts¹, are enjoined for special occasions only, and therefore may conveniently be overlooked. But I want to insist on two facts which are too often either ignored or vehemently denied: first, the phallic nature of the linga used for the pūjā; second, the aspects of its cult which fully sustain this conception, revealing that the linga is seen not merely as a phallus but as one that is active.

My sources will be taken from the Saiddhāntika scriptures

* This article reproduces, in a slightly extended form, a talk which I gave in Vienna in September 1995 during a conference on "Tantrism" organized by Prof. Gerhard Oberhammer, and that I repeated in Lausanne in February 1996, in French and in a different form, on the invitation of Prof. Johannes Bronkhorst. I have incorporated in the written version some reflections born from the remarks made by the audience on both occasions; but I have not tried to remove either the oral style or details which reveal the context in which the paper was first conceived. The polishing of the English, as well as some corrections and additions, are due to the kindness of Professor Alexis Sanderson, whom I thank here heartily.

¹ One instance is the observance (asidhārāvratā) described in Ma-taṅgapārameśvarāgama, kriyāpāda 11.41-53: analysis in A. Sanderson, Bull. of the School of Oriental and African Studies, Vol. XLVIII, [pp. 564-8], p. 565, col. 2. In the same passage, A. Sanderson mentions other Saiddhāntika scriptures that have similar injunctions; and he will adduce further instances in a work to come.

(henceforth Āgamas)² and from treatises of the same school. To deal with the first point, which is the less controversial, all the Āgamas and paddhatis may help. But insofar as the ritual is concerned, not all texts have descriptions or statements clear enough for my purpose. Inded there are almost none in those of the edited Āgamas, the majority, which are not ancient. Of the available handbooks, I shall rely mainly on Somaśambhu's, a work of the eleventh century, which has not lost touch with the concepts and practices of the early tradition³, and in one case on Īśānaśivaguru-deva's, a later work; but often I shall have to call to help some unpublished paddhatis – none of this material being later than the thirteenth century.

Let me now take up in succession the two points I have announced.

2. The icon called liṅga stands for the phallus of Śiva

It would seem that such a statement does not require demonstration. The word liṅga means phallus, and this is enough.

Yes, but liṅga is also used in logic with the meaning "sign" – any sign whatever. So that several scholars prefer to retain this meaning alone, even for the concrete image of Śiva: the liṅga in the temple, they say, is only the "sign" of the God, and has nothing to do with His membrum virile. Or, taking into account the meaning "subtle" that is also attached to the word, one would say that it is «the first "sign" or evolute of the essence of Śiva, in subtle form or matter»⁴. Others rely on the Purāṇas, where it is explained that the object called liṅga is in truth the infinite pillar of light which was revealed to Brahmā and Viṣṇu: how then could it be likened to a phallus?⁵ And others still will observe that the Vedic post (yūpa) is definitely not a phallic emblem, but an image of the axis mundi, and that our liṅga, which probably derives from it⁶, is to be seen in the same light. Underlying all these arguments, and occasionally clearly expressed, is the feeling that to think of a liṅga as a sexual organ is a scandalous disparagement of a sacred object of worship. Nor has this criticism been voiced by Hindus alone. H. H. Wilson, for instance, imputes the phallic interpretation to "the impure fancies of Europeans writers"⁷.

² Citations from Āgamas without bibliographical details are from the editions of N. R. Bhatt (Publications de l'Institut Français d'Indologie, Pondichéry).

³ I shall often refer to my translation of Somaśambhupaddhati, Publications de l'Institut Français d'Indologie No 25, Pondichéry (three vol. published: SP1, SP2, SP3 and one in the press, SP4), especially to SP4, which deals with pratiṣṭhā.

⁴ Doris M. Srinivasam, "Pre-Kuṣāṇa Śaivite Iconography", in Discourses on Śiva, edited by Michael W. Meister, University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia 1984 [pp. 32-46], p. 40. This author cannot but recognize the phallic symbolism of the cultic image (ibid., p. 41), but her presentation tends to make the reader believe that the liṅga is called liṅga for reasons other

A simple answer to these objections, inspired sometimes by ignorance, sometimes by a wrong interpretation of ritual injunctions, more often by prejudice – for the Hindus of today are generally prudish – lies in the mere observation of the marks (lakṣaṇas) that adorn the liṅga. Let us first recall that the monolithic shaft called liṅga is divided into three sections. The lower one, roughly cubic and called rudrabhāga, will be set in the central cavity of a than the obvious. See also n. 34.

One may cite, in the same vein, the nirukti analysis of the word in Kiraṇa, caryāpāda, 21.2: layaṃ gacchanti bhūtāni saṃhāre nikhilāny ataḥ / tena liṅgam iti proktaṃ sūkṣmatvāt liṅgam ucyate // But we must not be mistaken: the Kiraṇa does not give these lines as expressing its whole understanding of the liṅga; for elsewhere it describes and regards the object exactly as all other Āgamas do.

⁵ The denial is sometimes limited to a certain part of India. See for instance K. R. Srinivasam, Some Aspects of Religion as revealed by early Monuments and Literature of the South, University of Madras, 1960, p. 62. The author studies the concept of the liṅga in the Tamil country in the periods of the Nayanmars, and concludes with the affirmation that the early liṅgas of that region (unlike those of some neighbouring countries), were "totally devoid of phallic and fertility associations"; and that "the concept of the liṅga, as well as its form, was purely a symbol of a cosmic pillar of fire and light".

⁶ Or from a certain wooden post (kandu) representing a god in ancient times: see K. R. Srinivasam, loc. cit.

⁷ H. H. Wilson, Introduction to the translation of Viṣṇu-Purāṇa, p. lxix; quoted by H. K. Sastri, South Indian Images of Gods and Goddesses, (new ed.) Delhi 1974, p. 73.

big stone, the brahmaṣilā, itself buried into the ground; the middle one, an eight-sided prism called viṣṇubhāga, will be entirely cancelled by the "pedestal" (pīṭha), that envelops it once it is set on the *brahmaṣilā*⁸; while the upper one, roughly cylindrical and called rudrabhāga or pūjābhāga, will project out of it (see fig. 1).

Fig. 1: Longitudinal section of a liṅga already set in place (R = rudrabhāga, V = viṣṇubhāga, B = brahmabhāga, P = pīṭhikā with its outlet, P = pīṭha proper, P+P = pīṭha in common parlance, BS = brahmaṣilā)

the time covered by ornamental clothing and an accumulation of flowers, when not by a silver mask, with the result that the marks it bears cannot be perceived by onlookers. Even those among the devotees who are eventually allowed to witness the bath of the God (this depends on their status, but also on the part of India they live in) can hardly have time to see them, for the liṅga, when unclothed, is immediately smeared with the various substances used for its ritual bathing (abhiṣeka), and quickly dressed when ⁸ Sometimes four intermediate stones are inserted between the brahmaṣilā and the pīṭha. Details in SP4, ch. III, n. 65 and fig. 2.

⁹ These are in some texts respectively called brahmarekhā and viṣṇurekhā (and the central feature rudrarekhā); but such associations with the three Gods are late, and in no way indicative of the real signification of the lines.

It is on this rudrabhāga, the only visible part of the liṅga, that the characteristic "marks" are incised. Many variations in details are observed, but the main features are always present: a central "canal" (nāla), limited by two vertical lines, deeply incised, and two side-lines (pārśva- or pakṣarekhā)⁹ which form two symmetrical curves in the front before meeting at the back (see fig. 2 p. 27). These lines can be seen easily on a naked liṅga. But a liṅga under worship is most of the bath is over.

This situation may account for the general ignorance we have observed in Śaiva milieus regarding these features of the *liṅga*¹⁰. Nonetheless, the marks are there; they must necessarily be drawn on any immovable human-made liṅga before it is installed, and though they are geometrical lines¹¹, their aspect leaves no doubt about the model which inspires them: simply the human phallus¹². So, the word liṅga when it refers to the common Śiva's emblem worshipped in temples does mean phallus. One marvels at the blindness of the persons who definitely refuse this truth, when they must know that the "pedestal" in which the liṅga is inserted is commonly called, not only pīṭha and *pīṇḍikā*¹³, but also yoni. We shall come back to this yoni later.

Now, this liṅga is of course not a idol,

Fig. 2: Front-side of rudrabhāga, with its marks (A=central "canal", rudrarekhā in late texts; B = side-line, brahmarekhā in late texts; C = side-line, viṣṇurekhā in late texts; V = viṣṇubhāga)

¹⁰ There are perhaps exceptions among the people who worship in places where any devotee can touch the liṅga, though I have not personally encountered any.

¹¹ For the aspects they have taken since the fifth century, see Gritli v. Mitterwallner, "The Evolution of the liṅga", in Meister, op. cit., pp. 13-31, esp. fig. 9 on p. 19 (omitting the first two cases, which belong to the realistic period: see n. 12).

¹² The imitation is far better in the first known liṅgas (between 2nd cent. B.C. and 4th cent. A.D.), which are sometimes extremely realistic: see Meister, op. cit., Pl. 18, 19, 24. But I shall consider for my demonstration only those liṅgas that are closely associated with the ritual described in our texts. They may have derived from the realistic prototype by substituting incised lines for hard relief.

¹³ These two words are taken as synonyms in most of the known Āgamas. But older texts, including Somaśambhu's, insist on their difference, as I have shown in SP4, ch. III, n. 82. The second, pīṇḍikā, designates especially the upper part, as a rule monolithic and independent, of the whole "seat" or "pedestal" (pīṭha). Only this pīṇḍikā plays a role in the ritual.

to be worshipped for itself; it is the representation of the pure Spirit called Śiva – not only of a limited part of the body of Śiva, his membrum virile, but of Śiva Himself. It is Śiva. In the same way, the pīṭha is his Wife Herself (Umā, Gaurī, or any other name) – a statement which is repeated everywhere. But the Śaivas of old have chosen to represent the two deities in this context¹⁴ by those parts of their anthropomorphic bodies which they conceived as essential: the phallus and the vagina as organs of creation¹⁵. This representation prevails even when there are no concrete images, but only a mental meditation. Here is for instance the formula that is pronounced by the priest when he worships Śiva and Umā in two different pots: “Salutation to Thee, Umā, who hast the form of a vagina, and to Thee, Śaṅkara, who hast the form of a phallus!”¹⁶ Then he unites the God and the Goddess by showing the liṅgamudrā, a gesture which clearly evokes coitus¹⁷.

The concrete representation, in the cultic image, of the liṅga and the yonī coupled in eternal coitus strictly corresponds to the mental meditation just referred to; this is probably the reason why so many Āgamas insist that the worship of Śiva in a liṅga is the best worship possible. When it is performed on other supports (maṇḍalas, water-pots, fire and so on), the imagination makes up for the absence of an eloquent material model; but apparently the Siddhāntins do not believe that this mental work suffices when the daily cult is concerned; they give the concrete support a value of its own¹⁸.

¹⁴ The Goddess, when alone, is represented by a statue.

¹⁵ It may be remembered that for the Śaivites, Śiva, supreme God, is the creator and preserver, as well as the destructor, of the world. The liṅga obviously expresses the cosmic function of creation.

¹⁶ umāyai bhagarūpīṇyai liṅgarūpadharāya ca / śaṅkarāya namas tubhyam...; quoted in SP2, p. 72.

¹⁷ See SP1, Pl. I, mudrā No 19.

¹⁸ This preference for the liṅga among all other possible images, which can be inferred from any description of the daily cult, is clearly expressed in many texts: see for instance Ajitāgama, 30.8 sq; SP1, p. 228 (where Somaśambhu declares that the cult on a liṅga is atyantam uttamam), etc. This

I shall return later (see point 4) to the problem posed by the combination of concrete form and mentally created forms. Let us return to the liṅga and reflect on the logical objections to its representing Śiva's male organ raised by those who are not ignorant of the simple facts we have adduced. (a) Some persons may say that the liṅga has perhaps not always been worked the way we have seen and that the sexual connotation is not original. I shall answer that we have no Āgamic trace of a liṅga cult ignoring it, and refer them to Gopinath Rao's classical *Elements of Hindu Iconography*¹⁹, or to the paper of Gritli v. Mitterwallner on “The Evolution of the liṅga”²⁰, which shows that the marks have been there at least since the fifth century, naturalistic liṅgas having existed even earlier. (b) One may also point to the existence of liṅgas which are not man-made and bear no mark²¹. This is true; but our texts explain that these “special” liṅgas do not need marks to be recognized as images of Śiva: they were spontaneously inhabited by Śiva if “natural” (svayambhū) or *bāṇa*²², or made to be if installed by supernatural beings, such as gods and ṛṣis. (c) A more serious objection would consist in suggesting that liṅgas and pīṭha may be what I say them to be, but only as indicators of the generative power of Śiva when associated with His Śakti, as signs that we have not to consider otherwise than symbolically. The answer to that will be given later. (d) Finally, the fact that the liṅga, even if it is truly the representation of Śiva's phallus, is not perceived as such by the great majority of devotees, is sometimes produced as a proof of the “purity” of this symbol. My reply is simple: should we mistake the registration of general ignorance for the establishment of the truth?

choice seems to be a characteristic feature of the Siddhānta school: the Śākta schools, and even the Bhairava school of Śaivism give maṇḍalas or other images a higher value. I have no explanation to offer for this difference.

¹⁹ New-York 1968, reprint of 1914 ed., 2 vol., 4 parts; vol 2, pp. 94-95 and Pl. VI, VI, X (several confusions in the note p. 94).

²⁰ Cited n. 11.

²¹ These are the “special liṅgas” to which many rules given for the ordinary ones do not apply. See SP4, ch. II, śl.176-177 et notes.

²² See SP4, Index.

On all these points, the best answers will be given by the ritual. It is time to turn to it, taking successively into consideration the procedure of Installation of a liṅga (liṅgapraṭiṣṭhā) and the daily cult which concerns it (liṅgapūjā).

3. The ritual concerning the liṅga stresses the sexual significance of this object

a) Installation of a liṅga

The procedure of pratiṣṭhā is a very complicated one²³, of which I shall only note some salient features.

Let us first consider the definition that Somaśambhu (and many other authors) gives at the start: "The liṅga is Śiva, the pīṭha is Śakti, and the pratiṣṭhā is their Union, with the help of mantras." The ritual will accordingly consist, after the due preparation of the two stones (plus some others, of less importance), of the material installation and junction, in the garbhagrha of the temple, of both these objects. The rite symbolizes on the material plane the Union of two spiritual Beings which takes place (or perhaps is always achieved)²⁴ on the metaphysical plane.

The normal procedure, necessarily followed when no concrete characteristic of one or the other of the objects prevents it, is to place the liṅga first, then to join the pīṭha – or rather the piṇḍikā.

We have already alluded to a phase of the preparation of the liṅga, namely the drawing – more rightly incision – of the lines it must bear in order to resemble a phallus, and hence, as our texts declare, to be acceptable to Śiva. An artisan will do the work; but the main officiating priest (the ācārya, often called sthāpaka in this context) first traces the lines²⁵ with a golden stylet, while reciting mantras. This rite, called lakṣaṇoddhāra, is a very solemn moment in the preparation of the liṅga. Let me add that the piṇḍi-

²³ The question has been dealt with in detail in SP4, ch. II and III.

²⁴ Two visions are possible, according to the status one accepts for the Śakti involved. See SP4, Intr., V, 5.

²⁵ Theoretically. In practice he performs the rite after the lines have been incised.

kā, which is a monolithic²⁶ stone ring with a superior flat surface, is also inscribed with a mark on the margin of its hole: a drawing "in the form of an aśvattha leaf", that is to say a yoni, the use of which will be clear later. We see that nothing is spared to convince us of the sexual significance of both objects.

A ritual preparation, which may last for several days, transforms the stone into a body (mūrti) of Śiva by making it, through a series of nyāsa, inhabited by the God and by several groups of associated divinities. In the same way, the big ring called piṇḍikā is ritually transformed into the body of the Goddess.

The liṅga is now fixed in the center of the garbhagrha, at the proper time and after a noisy and colourful circumambulation of the temple precincts. This is one of the peaks of the ceremony, but there is nothing special in it that bears on our problem.

It is the next phase, to wit, the junction of the piṇḍikā with the liṅga, which must hold our attention. According to the definition given above, it represents the pratiṣṭhā proper, that is, the Union of Śiva with the Goddess. The ritual effects their coitus: the piṇḍikā is first suspended just above the liṅga; then, at the right time, it is made to slowly descend along it, up to the moment it touches either the rest of the pīṭha (if this has been built separately) or the the brahmaśilā, referred to earlier (if piṇḍikā and pīṭha are of one piece). These latter details are of no import. What is essential to picture for oneself is the movement of the piṇḍikā itself, which is eloquent enough, all the more if we add that it is so done that the small vulva incised on the piṇḍikā glides exactly along the central mark of the liṅga (the "canal", limited by two vertical lines)²⁷. I leave it to you to imagine the position of the partners. That of Śiva, if one wishes to complete his body, will be found unexpected – but I do not think that this consequence has even been seriously considered, at least I never came across any discussion on the subject. That of the Goddess is of greater significance, for it gives all its meaning to the name of the closed

²⁶ It may have two parts, but only when very big or, according to some texts, when the liṅga is a mukhaliṅga. See SP4, ch. I, [2a].

²⁷ Details and references in SP4, ch. III, nn. 82 et 86.

room where the liṅga is standing (and verily should not be seen): garbhagṛha, "house of the embryo"²⁸.

The late texts omit the description of the essential gesture I have just insisted upon – they just say that the guru sets the pīṭha in place – while they give a huge importance to the material junction of the stones, which has no ritual meaning²⁹. But almost all texts, after the bath which follows immediately the Junction, demand that the guru show the liṅgamudrā, a gesture which we have already met and which clearly expresses the significance of the preceding ritual, and even duplicates it.

Let us insist on the essential result obtained from the preceding study: the liṅga in a temple represents Śiva coupled with his Śakti in an eternal coitus³⁰.

b) After the pratiṣṭhā

Another significant feature of the ritual is the interval of three days which stands between the pratiṣṭhā and the beginning of the normal cult on the *liṅga*³¹. Mentioned by several handbooks and at least suggested by almost every Āgama³², this interval is of course to be compared with the same period of three days that several works on Dharma require to pass between a human marriage and its consummation. During this period, several rites take place concerning the liṅga, but two features of the daily cult are missing. Firstly, there are no ablutions (abhiṣeka) of the liṅga. Secondly, and more importantly, there is no *nirmālya*³³: flowers and other substances that have been offered to the liṅga during the cult are not subject to the taboos that normally restrict their handling. There is not the space here to analyze these features in detail. Let me say only that they are nowhere explained in the texts and that the only explanation that appears to me to account for them is that, though the coitus has taken place, the emission of semen is kept in check. Things are regularized, if I may say so, only on the fourth day. Then begins the usual routine, which I have now to consider.

²⁸ The word is generally translated otherwise: either by "cella" or "sanctuary", or by "inner apartment", "inner closed room", etc. But I think that the meaning I am suggesting, and which amount to "womb", is not at all far-fetched or artificial. It is however not impossible that this inner sanctuary of a temple got initially its name through the word garbha understood as "closed space".

²⁹ See for instance Ajitāgama, 18.215-219; Pūrva-Kāmikāgama, Madras 1975, 64.154-160. Even the Āgamas less concerned with this cementing (technically called aṣṭabandhana from the name of the best known of the cements that may be used) are despairingly short in their description of piṇḍikāsthāpana: see for instance Mataṅga-Pārameśvarāgama, kriyāpāda 13.40cd-41a. But this could by no means be interpreted as a different conception of the pratiṣṭhā; the discretion of the texts probably reflects a simplification of the procedure that has been introduced for the sake of convenience. I have been told by a temple-priest (who was fully aware that it should not be so) that the pīṭha is actually put in place in advance by an artisan, and the guru recites only later the mantras which are supposed to accompany the material junction. Such a deviation may have taken place long ago.

³⁰ Gritli v. Mitterwallner (op. cit., p. 27) misunderstands the position of the liṅga, and naturally comes to a wrong conclusion regarding the significance of the couple formed by the liṅga and the yoni.

c) Daily cult on the liṅga.

It will be enough for our purpose to point to two aspects of this cult, which clearly testify to the sexual character of the liṅga.

First, the abhiṣeka. No one who has seen this rite solemnly performed in a temple can have missed the phase when milk, ghee, buttermilk and curds are poured over the liṅga. Now, do not these white substances irresistibly evoke the semen? When one knows that they are commonly assimilated to it in India³⁴, and be-

³¹ Note that, once the pratiṣṭhā is accomplished, the word liṅga stands for the composite object formed by the rudrabhāga of the liṅga proper and the pīṭha out of which it emerges.

³² Even when they have not mentioned the special period of three days, many of them give special instructions for "the fourth day": see Ajitāgama 18.277a; Pūrva-Kāmikāgama, Madras 1974, 64.193a.

³³ For the question of nirmālya, see SP2, pp. 266-88 and Brunner, "De la consommation du nirmālya de Śiva", Journal Asiatique (année 1969), Paris 1970, pp. 213-63.

³⁴ See for instance Padoux, "Le monde hindou et le sexe", Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie, vol. LXXVI, 1984, p. 36.

sides, that abhiṣeka must be avoided during the days when Śiva is supposed to abstain from sexual activity, one cannot doubt that what we see as "ablutions" are, at least in part, the concrete proof of this very activity. No matter if the devotees, and perhaps the priests themselves, are not aware of the fact.

Second, the rules concerning the nirmālya. We have already seen that for three days after the liṅgapraṭiṣṭhā "there is no nirmālya", as there is no abhiṣeka. No text forgets to mention the first of these exceptions to the normal rule, either when dealing with praṭiṣṭhā, or with pūjā, or with *prāyaścitta*³⁵. Now, the nirmālya is taboo if it comes from an immovable man-made liṅga. Here too I shall add that no matter if the old rule has for a long time ceased to be observed. The important thing is that there is a rule strictly prohibiting the use, and even the touching of these remnants of Śiva³⁶. Why should it be so, except for the first three days, if the danger of nirmālya was not connected with the sexual activity of the God? It is well known from Purāṇas that the semen of Śiva is dangerous for ordinary persons; one may extend the idea to anything that has been deposited on the liṅga. The exceptions concerning some types of liṅgas do not undermine, but rather confirm, this vision – though a thorough investigation of all the cases would be demanded in order to explain exactly the reasons why this or that liṅga escapes the normal restrictions.

To conclude this short enquiry, I shall sum up my verdict: the immovable man-made liṅga in the temple represents Śiva's male organ; and the erected position of this organ does not connote seminal retention, as A. Bharati, approvingly cited by Stella Kramrisch³⁷ declares, but the position naturally connected with the emission of Śiva's seed into the matrix of the Goddess, that is the

³⁵ See SP2, p. 288, śl. 71 and n. 1.

³⁶ The only person to touch them is the officiating priest who has to remove them from the liṅga and give them to the fierce god Caṇḍa, alone susceptible to stand their impact.

³⁷ The Presence of Śiva, Princeton University Press 1981, p. 164. This vision is shared by many scholars, more than once as a result of an assumed similarity between the liṅga and the representations of ithyphallic Lakulīśa.

"house of the embryo", *garbhagrha*³⁸. The temple liṅga is, I would say, normally active, except for the first three days after the praṭiṣṭhā. This is why its worship, or more exactly the worship of Śiva who resides in it with his Śakti, gives bhukti as well as mukti – a result much sought for by ancient Śaivas. Such a belief certainly corresponds to the opinion, expressed in many texts, that the best of ācāryas is the married man (the grhastha), for he only can give bhukti as well as mukti.

4. Some difficulties

Now I must be fair and state some aspects of the Śaiva ritual that might seem not to fit in the interpretation I have defended.

a) I shall first mention an important feature of the daily pūjā. The cult begins with the evocation (or construction) and worship of Śiva's throne, the different sections of which are "built" with mantras and projected on the material pīṭha. It continues with the evocation of the nine Goddesses who sit on this throne, the last and most eminent of whom, Manonmanī, is installed in the center of the lotus flower which terminates the throne and opens at the level of the piṇḍikā. Then comes the evocation of Śiva Himself, in the form of Sadāśiva, who sits near Manonmanī. His Form is built by an imaginative process accompanied by the recitation of mantras and projected on the *liṅga*³⁹. It is to this mental image that the cult will be offered. What then, after these dhyānas, of the couple formed by vulva and phallus? They have simply disappeared, a fact that is stressed by Aghoraśiva, a twelfth century author, who observes, regarding the liṅga: *liṅgā-kāropamardena bhāvane liṅgatām tyajet*⁴⁰. The worship will be carried out by visualizing Sadāśiva alone; the concrete image is forgotten. And the rule holds good for any divinity, regardless of the concrete form which serves as support for its worship. Now, does this fact suffice to demolish my demonstration? I don't think so. The Form that one has to worship is given a human-like aspect in order that the worshipper faces a Being to whom the "services" (upacāras) he has now to offer are appropriate: washing the feet, giving water to drink, bathing, clothing and the like are actions usually performed for men, not for stones. Besides – and this may be important – this dhyāna is the occasion when this worshipper can choose, among the various aspects that the God may assume, the one which corresponds to the actions that he will demand of Him. For the transcendent Śiva who resides in the liṅga takes any Form that suits his devotee: the Form called "common", that is to say the white Sadāśiva, if the cult is performed without any specific aim; a special one in the opposite case⁴¹, to wit the case of a *sādhaka*⁴². So, it is normal for the worshipper, at this stage of the pūjā, to extract from the liṅga, if I may say so, the God who lies there, with the aspect he wishes Him to take. Exactly the same would be done if the cult had been made on another image (a maṇḍala, a pot, the fire, etc.). Let us note that it would be an error to conclude from the importance of dhyāna that the nature of the concrete image is irrelevant. Though it disappears to the mental eyes of the worshipper, it is still there, with its specific virtues;

³⁸ This is my answer to all the scholars who, while admitting the phallic nature of the liṅga, refuse to recognize the erotic in the symbol. This is perhaps the place to mention the curious argumentation of Doris M. Srinivasam (op. cit., p. 42): observing that liṅgas in temples are given names resembling name of persons, but lacking the key to decipher them, this scholar wrongly concludes that these names "tend to negate the erotic element". (For the naming of a liṅga, see SP4, ch. III, n. 115.)

³⁹ See SP1, pp. 154-184.

⁴⁰ Quoted in SP1, p. 179, under [57c]. This remark implies that the dhyāna enjoined before is a constructive process, resulting in the creation of

an object (Sadāśiva) that must appear to be as "real" as the material image of the God – and even more so, since it cancels it.

⁴¹ See Mṛgendāgama, kriyāpāda, 3. 40-49; trad. Brunner pp. 63-70 (but the first line of p. 69 is faulty).

⁴² The sādhaka is, among the initiated devotees, one who intensely worships a special form of Śiva (or of another god) in order to acquire super-human powers and live in bliss wherever he (or she) wishes and as long as he (or she) wishes. I must perhaps repeat here what I am at pains to make scholars accept: that the installation of immovable liṅgas is not restricted to the temples where what we call "public worship" is conducted. It was the best image for the private cult of the sādhaka; and most of the rules that govern its installation and worship are actually given in the older treatises with this context in view. See for instance Mataṅga-Pārameśvarāgama, kriyāpāda 13.1-2; Kiraṇāgama, Devakoṭṭai, 1932 (car. grantha), caryāpāda, 21, passim.

and we have seen that those of the liṅga, linked, as seen earlier, with its sexual symbolism, are the best.

b) Another difficulty may come from the fact that Purāṇas and local myths speak of liṅgas representing earth, water etc., whose existence might seem to deny our vision of the common liṅgas. All I can say is that these bhūtalīṅgas, as they are sometimes called, are not under the Āgamic jurisdiction, of which alone I am speaking. If a certain Āgama mentions them, the section is undoubtedly late – at least, such is my conviction.

c) More serious perhaps is the fact that other gods than Śiva, and even Goddesses, may exceptionnally be represented by liṅgas. Here too, I shall say that we are outside the Āgamic domain. The word liṅga may well signify "sign" in this last case; but my study concerns the śivalīṅga only – more exactly the immovable śivalīṅga of the temple, the most common and most revered image of Śiva.

d) Finally, I should perhaps come back on the difficulties I have alluded to at the beginning, namely, the present ignorance of most Śaivas regarding the nature of the liṅga and the character of its cult, not in order simply to register it and accept that the vision of these modern devotees should henceforth be considered the truth, but to try to explain the loss of the ancient knowledge. I believe that the present ignorance and the various deviations that we may observe in the practice of ritual have the same origin: the transformation of a cult first meant for initiated persons only, and mostly for sādhakas, first into a cult accessible to all, including *gr̥hasthas*⁴³, and finally into a cult performed by a body of specialists for the sake of a vast community – that which we call "public worship". The sādhakas acted for themselves, with definite aims in view; they devoted all their time and energy to the worship of their chosen deity and took it very seriously; they knew exactly what a liṅga stood for, how it was installed, how it had to be worshipped, and so on. This knowledge was no doubt partly lost when less involved persons took to the same cult. It is now preserved only (with a few exceptions)⁴⁴ by the body of officiating priests in temples who, like many officials, are too often little concerned with what they do. If they still know the sequence of the daily cult, and some of them the main phases of a pratiṣṭhā, they are mainly attached to the external actions prescribed by the ritual, and certainly never pause to understand their inner meaning. The late Āgamas, and still more the late handbooks, already betray this attitude. It is no wonder in these conditions that the ordinary devotees should know almost nothing about the rituals they passively attend. They are not to be blamed; but there is no reason for scholars to accept their misconceptions.

⁴³ One will find here an echo of the observations that Alexis Sanderson has developed on several occasions. See for instance "Śaivism and the Tantric Traditions", The World's Religions, Routledge, London 1988 [pp. 660-704], p. 691 sq. Adjustments of a different type, but similarly motivated by the desire to widen the circle of affiliated persons, are mentioned in his "Purity and Power among the Brahmins of Kashmir", The Category of the Person, Cambridge University Press, 1985, [pp. 190-216], p. 203.

5. Two remarks in guise of conclusion

(a) Concerning the worshipper: these, to me evident, sexual connotations of the liṅga morphology and of its cult are in no way in contradiction with the conception of Śiva as a transcendent God, omniscient and omnipotent, full of grace, and capable of inducing respect, reverence and love in his devotees. Neither are they opposed to an unselfish attitude in the devotee's mind, who may worship a liṅga with a high purpose in view – though, if he solely aims at liberation, that is, if he is a true mumukṣu, he will certainly not install one for himself⁴⁵, as will a sādhaka.

(b) Concerning the nature of the Saiddhāntika school of

⁴⁴ Exceptions in two senses. First, positive: there are still living persons who have received dīkṣā and worship a liṅga (but a movable one). Second, negative: even the best "specialists" in the temples have inherited only a fragment of the old knowledge, some in fact a very tiny one.

⁴⁵ Or rather have one installed by an ācārya, for this concerns the initiate called putraka (see SP3, Index) who is not empowered to make a pratiṣṭhā. The late Āgamas and handbooks suggest that he is given a movable liṅga for his private cult – a liṅga that naturally must be ritually installed. Many details of the cult concerning this movable object seem however to point to its late introduction within the Śaiva ritual. The question is not easy and would need more research for a firm conclusion to be drawn.

Śaivism: the sexual aspects that I have put forward are in keeping with its inclusion among the Tantric schools⁴⁶, though they are definitely not the reason for this inclusion. Some other features are more significant: the classification of Tantras, which goes back to a fairly old age and that one cannot ignore; the form of mantras, which are not Vedic; the insistence on bhāvanā; the enormous role played by *nyāsa*s; the number of tattvas, etc. It was however perhaps not useless to insist on this sexual aspect, which one is too ready to lend to more extreme schools, and show in this way that the gap between Siddhānta on the one hand, and all the other Śaiva and Śākta schools on the other hand, is not as wide as many people think⁴⁷.

⁴⁶ An inclusion which is never objected to when one deals with classifications, but very often forgotten as soon as one tries to characterize the Tantric schools, and especially their ontology. See for instance Padoux, article "Tantrism" in The Encyclopedia of Religion, Mircea Eliade ed. in chief, New-York 1986, p. 277, col. 2: the presentation of Tantric cosmogony that we read there does not apply to the Siddhānta school.

⁴⁷ A point often insisted upon by Alexis Sanderson. See n. 1. One would arrive at the same conclusion by taking into consideration the activities that the Saiddhāntikāgamas ascribe to sādhakas after they have obtained the powers they sought, and that are also commonly associated with extreme schools.

